When you use a digital camera, the data that's stored on the memory card is a raster file. So is your scanned document, or any other type of stored image. A raster image is simply one image with no layers and no hidden layers. Adding layers

Layers are the foundation of all Photoshop work. Layers are a way to keep your image organized and to prevent the building and layering of parts of an image until you're ready. At any time in Photoshop, you can create a layer by right-clicking on a layer thumbnail and then choosing Layer⇒New Layer. You can click anywhere on an image window to begin working on a new layer. You can place your new layer anywhere on the image window, including in the same location as a previous layer. You can create a layer for every existing layer and see it in the Layers palette. Although you can save the final result of a new layer as a bitmap or grayscale (greyscale) file, I recommend that you save your work as a Photoshop format file. You can find out more about file formats in the next section. Creating, stacking, and merging layers

When you're ready to start a new image, you typically begin by creating a new document in Photoshop. When you create a new document, you're actually creating a new location on your hard disk. A new document has no layers, as shown in Figure 9-5. You can change the resolution of a document by using the Resize Image dialog box, which you can display by choosing View⇒Image Size⇒Resize Image or by pressing Ctrl+1 (+1 on the Mac). To create a new layer, either by converting an existing layer or by clicking the New Layer icon in the Layers palette, choose Layers⇒New. The New Layer dialog box opens, as shown in Figure 9-6. If you choose to convert an existing layer to a new layer, the new layer is created in the same location as the existing layer. If you chose to create a new layer, the New Layer dialog box prompts you to place it. You can do that by clicking in the Preview area or you can drag the new layer's thumbnail on the preview into the desired location. Note that each layer that you create also has its own layer mask. Advice for the aspiring actor Whether you want to become a professional actor or simply enjoy acting in your free time, there are plenty of useful things you can do to improve your performance, motivation, and outlook for the future. Create a successful audition résumé You're going to need one for auditions, so now's the time to put it together. You should include every major performance you've ever been involved in (even those that didn't end in full-time acting jobs), however brief. Include any auditions that didn't go to completion, because if you're going to send in audition materials on a regular basis, you should have something out there to show. If you're a theatre actor, you should also include theatre highlights. It's no secret that people who find their way into the theatre are some of the most well-recognised people in the world. So when you audition, when you get a callback or a role, you can mention that you were the person in the community who worked for free in the local amateur theatre. If you're planning on moving into cinema, you should include a list of films you've been in. If you can't remember every project you've done, get it written down as soon as you can. Your résumé will also include any other relevant aspects of your life. For example, if you're in a relationship and you're nervous about auditioning with your significant other there, include it. Or if you need to lose weight, include your total bodyweight to ensure you don't get overlooked for more physically fit roles. Put your best foot forward It seems obvious, but dressing well when auditioning is really important, especially if you're auditioning for a role that's considered to be a glamorous one. Don't be discouraged if you're not a skinny, tall, young actor, because there are opportunities out there for all different people, and there are even film roles for non-actors, such as extras. You should have some clothing that you can experiment in and look good in, but don't overwhelm yourself. Don't wear something that's going to make you uncomfortable, because it's just going to make you stand out and be less credible. If you want to wear something that fits in with your other acting clothes or social setting, go for it. Just don't wear a skirt or dress that's restrictive in any way, and make
