OnLive boss Steve Perlman has told GamesIndustry International that the company has not yet started work on a sequel to its failed cloud-gaming service, and that hopes of resuming work soon "will be for reality to bear out". He also said that the company's loss of customers is a growing concern and that the company is "concerned" about the future of the service. "At the moment, no one has made it clear to us whether the service has a future," Perlman said. The service crashed and burned a few weeks before it was due to launch, following months of controversy surrounding a protracted wrangle with the leader of GameStop, who objected to OnLive's plans to create player accounts for its games. The service launched on 22 September after being pushed back to the 25 3e33713323
