What is a virtual serial number? A virtual serial number (sometimes referred to as a "vserial") is a number used by anti-virus vendors to prevent counterfeit or pirated copies of their programs from being distributed and downloaded. A virtual serial number is a key assigned to a specific copy of your anti-virus software product, like a validating key. When used on a disc or other removable media, the virtual serial number is randomly created at installation and changes whenever you install a new version of the product. This is meant to make it difficult for an unscrupulous vendor to produce copies of the product and distribute them to more than a handful of people. Where do anti-virus vendors get their virtual serial numbers? There are many places where a virtual serial number can be created, including: A random number generator If the vendors use random numbers, it would be hard to know exactly which numbers they have assigned and which ones have been used, so their software would be very difficult to reproduce. A validating key The easiest place for a vendor to get a virtual serial number is to provide his or her own validating key. This is the way many in-house developed anti-virus programs work. The vendor can create one validating key when the product is released, and then just re-use that same validating key from one program to the next. A version identifier While not typically used by anti-virus vendors, a virtual serial number can sometimes be generated by a version identifier. Version identifiers such as "version.x" or "prodversion.x" are often used by software distributors to indicate which version of the software they are distributing or which version of the software they are releasing. Because version identifiers can only be created by the vendor, and because these identifiers are easily tracked across all distributions (unlike random numbers), they are almost always used for the virtual serial number and thus are also easily tracked. How is it used? Virtual serial numbers are sometimes seen as "useful" in practice. Vendors use virtual serial numbers to avoid piracy. This makes piracy extremely difficult, as a product cannot be replicated easily if the virtual serial number is known to only have been used once. A virtual serial number is also often used for marketing purposes, such as to ensure that a program is distributed only to the people
