David Lynch's movie adaptations have usually been a joy to view. From the unutterably weird and wonderful Eraserhead, to the psychedelic and mind-bending Inland Empire (or "The Elephant Man," if you prefer) — and his latest, this year's frankly bonkers and brilliant Blue Velvet (or "The Miracle Worker," if you prefer) — Lynch has always wowed us. But Lynch's originality is another story, and often, for Lynch films, there is a major discussion — with me, anyway — about the seeming lack of originality in Lynch's television series, Twin Peaks. The FBI, yes. The rain. The ominous soundtrack with its insistent, repeated drum beat. Even the logo is derivative. You could make the case that it's not just the music that's derivative, but the whole thing. I wouldn't say Lynch is a copycat, but more of an inspiration. But he is also a great fan of film. And if you see Lynch's latest feature film, Twin Peaks: Fire Walk with Me (aka "The Missing Links," if you prefer), which premiered in the U.S. in the summer of 1990 and finally saw its U.K. release today, you will see where his heart and head have gone in the course of a quarter of a century. The plot, if you're not in the know, is about FBI Special Agent Dale Cooper, played by Kyle MacLachlan, who has gone off-duty to investigate the murder of his childhood friend, Laura Palmer. Lynch's allusions to Rear Window, The Third Man and Persona, the Hitchcock classic, are obvious enough, but they're not really what this is about. The sense of camaraderie between Cooper and Laura forms the essential spine of Fire Walk With Me. Cooper is linked to another childhood friend, Annie Blackburn, played by Sheryl Lee and he's emotionally involved with another woman, Audrey Horne (Sherilyn Fenn). What you need to know is that this is a film about loneliness — a theme which is reflected throughout the Lynch universe. And in Fire Walk With Me, he absolutely nails it. Just before Christmas I was lucky enough to sit down with Lynch and the actual Laura Palmer in Oslo, where Lynch was shooting a series of voiceovers. It was quite difficult to know what I was going to get from these interviews. Lynch and Palmer had both been interviewed many times over the past decade — by me and others,
