The gazillion layers Photoshop has layers. A layer is a complex object that enables you to reuse portions of the image (called parts) and reapply them wherever you want. By multiplying the layers, you can get some pretty nice effects. For example, let's say you have a logo for a company, which is several layers. You want to apply a nice, thick black stroke around the "S" in the word _Sergeant_ (see Figure 3-17). Instead of doing all of that in one step, you can split the layer into two separate layers. One for the stroke and one for the Sergent font. Figure 3-17 Applying a thick black stroke using layers Then, you can duplicate those layers and apply the stroke to the bottom layer and the Sergent font to the top layer. This way, you can draw several lines (as many as you want) on top of the same lines (see Figure 3-18). Figure 3-18 Applying several lines to the same stroke * * * Note Each layer must have a unique name to be used for a particular result. If you use a layer that has already been used for something else, it will be overwritten. * * *

Due to a recent quality of life change, we have decided to remove the "personal" 1st-level wizard spell, as well as personal 1st-level cleric spells. However, we were still able to make these rules and are also enforcing them, as the rule changes made previously are still in effect (specifically that players may only have 2 spell slots at each spellcaster level, as opposed to 3). Part of the reason for this change is we'd rather not change the game with only a few months left before the drop rate. We do plan to support the game in that time span, however, and if any homebrew is desired, the work will be completed so that it's not a case of just copying and pasting the rules. The other part of the reason is that, if someone's homebrewed spell isn't in the exact same format as a spell that's already in the
