This is called mode 1. A user can also run AutoCAD in "Design" mode. This is where the user can edit drawings, modify layer assignments and place and modify objects. It is also where dynamic layers, blocks and families are created. AutoCAD can also be used in "Draft" mode. This is where the user is allowed to create drawings but not modify existing drawings. This is where one creates a drawing to be used as a template for further drawings, or as a base for a working drawing. AutoCAD's "Online Design (OD)" mode. This is where the user performs design activities, drawing modifications and others on the Internet. In this mode, the drawing is accessible by anyone with a web browser through the Internet. After using AutoCAD in Draft mode for some time, or after the draft is opened in Design mode, it may be switched to mode 2. In this mode, all tasks are performed on the drawing. To switch a drawing from mode 1 to mode 2, type "2" in the command window, or press F2. In AutoCAD 2012, when the user opens a drawing in Design mode, the command window will open. If the user wants to modify a drawing, they should click on Design > Start Drawing. Drawing views AutoCAD has a number of views which can be displayed when a drawing is opened in a specific view mode. The default (first view) is the drawing view. This is the view where the user will place, modify and place objects on the drawing. The detail (second view) is the view where a user can see more detail of the drawing. The surface (third view) shows the surface of the model, showing elevations and angles. The section (fourth view) shows the surface of the model, showing elevations and angles. This view is used for section cuts, section views, elevation
