The molecular bases of prostate cancer growth is poorly understood, and the mechanisms of action of growth factors in prostate carcinogenesis are largely unknown. These poorly understood mechanisms are suspected to be the basis of the lack of success of current therapeutic strategies. To better understand the biology of prostate cancer, we have used Affymetrix Gene Chip microarrays to determine the global patterns of gene expression in two normal human prostate cell lines (VCAP and RWPE), and four prostate cancer cell lines, PC3, DU145, LNCaP, and 22Rv1. These data were generated, and analyzed under three experimental conditions: no treatment, and treatment with either EGF (10 ng/ml) or PDGF-BB (10 ng/ml). Global patterns of gene expression were compared with the pattern of gene expression in prostate cancer tissues, and information on the patterns of gene expression in normal and cancer tissues was organized into a three-dimensional landscape.

There was a striking similarity between patterns of gene expression in PC3 cells and prostate cancer tissues, and strong activation of genes involved in intracellular signaling, proteolysis, cell cycle control, and angiogenesis was observed in PC3 and cancer cells. Genes involved in cell migration and chemotaxis were also upregulated. The results clearly indicate that there is a global activation of genes expressed by normal and cancer cells, which is mediated by EGF and PDGF stimulation. This points to important growth-related pathways that are activated in prostate cancers, and may play a role in the evasion of apoptosis during the progression of the disease.

Back to Nature: What Early Humans Were Foraging For Over a million years ago, humans became the dominant species in the world and started to transform the planet. The earliest Homo sapiens individuals worked with big meat-eating animals and soon started roaming the savannahs and forests around the globe

This application proposes to create a non-clinical research training program for three medical students per year in molecular biology at the University of Illinois College of Medicine at Chicago (UICC) to permit them to develop into academic scientists. The program would be linked to the research programs of the NUCCS (Northeast Illinois Clinical and Translational Sciences Consortium). UICC and its affiliated regional medical school, the University of Chicago, are uniquely positioned to conduct these training activities in an environment of rigorous research
