Old South Welsh Old South Welsh (OSW) is the name given to the Welsh language that was spoken by the settlers that arrived in South Wales in the fifth century. In Wales In the 11th and 12th centuries, the language of Wales became increasingly influenced by English-derived languages, including the Vikings and Norman French, and gradually became a medium of the Welsh people. In Welsh literature, the term "Old Welsh" is commonly used to differentiate the language of earlier texts from the language of modern speech. Language families The old South Welsh language group is based on a genealogical relationship and a shared typological prototype from which it evolved, which is of a close relationship to the South Welsh language. The last elements of this language to be written are the Latin manuscripts produced in Gellifaelfawr (see below), but it is thought that the language continued to be used informally as late as the 15th century, and it is sometimes referred to as the "mother tongue" of the Welsh. The Reformed Medieval Welsh spoken by the early settlers in South Wales is believed to have been mutually intelligible with the language of the earlier Cymric language spoken by the people of the British Isles before the Roman invasions in the 1st century. It is also believed that the language of the Old South Welsh (OSW) spoken by the settlers in South Wales was influenced by its Scandinavian predecessors and its chronological proximity to the dates of the Viking invasions of England. In Wales During the years 700 and the early 800s, the Old South Welsh people were an early people of the British Isles. A number of Saxon-derived languages including English had invaded the British Isles by the 7th century, and the Old South Welsh language in the south and east of Britain may have survived until the eleventh century.
