An active matrix type liquid crystal display device is known as an example of a semiconductor device including TFTs. In the active matrix type liquid crystal display device, a TFT is disposed in each of several tens to several millions of pixel regions arranged in a matrix to control electric charge going into and out of a corresponding pixel electrode by a switching function of the TFT. The liquid crystal display device has advantages such that it can be reduced in size and thickness and is capable of achieving high image quality and low power consumption. Therefore, the liquid crystal display device is used for a wide range of applications such as a monitor for a personal computer, a television and a cellular phone. As a system for driving the active matrix type liquid crystal display device, a system using a polysilicon film is known. A polysilicon film used for the semiconductor layer of the TFT formed on a glass substrate has higher field-effect mobility (μ) than an amorphous silicon film. Also, it is possible to make the film thicker than an amorphous silicon film, and hence the semiconductor layer of the TFT is called a polysilicon film. However, crystallization of the polysilicon film require long time and high-temperature heating (long crystallization time), and the temperature when the polysilicon film is crystallized, i.e., a crystallization temperature is high. Accordingly, a technology for using a semiconductor layer in which field-effect mobility (μ) is lower than that of the crystallized polysilicon c9d1549cdd
