“Over the last decade of FIFA’s life, we’ve seen a huge increase in data volume, from games, players, pitches and practices,” said Andreas Seidl, Senior Gameplay Producer at EA Sports. “By harnessing this massive data set, we can now add more refined physics, more detailed animations and ultimately give players a better, more accurate game to play.” “FIFA has always been built on innovation, using real-world data to create authentic football,” said Chris Porter, Executive Producer at EA Canada. “Using HyperMotion Technology allows us to expand on this foundation even further, opening up new opportunities for players to take on opponents, make new transitions or score all-new goals.” HyperMotion Technology enables a number of new gameplay features. Physics FIFA 22 introduces five degrees of freedom of movement, including the ability to see and feel more player movements on-screen. Players now react to contact with more natural responses, reacting differently to every tackle in the game. Players use an intelligent physics engine that allows for far more natural and interesting collisions and reactions. The goal is to balance the control and simulation of a football match. A more realistic engine could have made everything too easy. Instead, FIFA 22 features gameplay that closely emulates a real football game. Motion Capture Players will feel more responsive and in control of the ball during gameplay, even if they’re out of possession. FIFA 22 features more realistic and accurate motion capture data, allowing players to hit the ball more naturally and fluidly. Players will sense the ball directly under their feet, rather than just seeing it as a paddle from behind. Players will feel more powerful when receiving passes and can make more accurate dribbles or tackles. The “feel” of passing, receiving, running and shooting will be further improved. For the first time in FIFA, players will be able to use both feet to control the ball. Players will be better able to evade an on-coming opponent or dribble past them. Defenders will also have more options when defending a player’s run, with a more natural, fluid defensive movement. Players will feel the impact of tackles and defences will react more realistically. Ball Control FIFA 22 introduces a new ball control animation system that’s smoother, more responsive and
