Skeletal muscle and cardiovascular function, circulation, blood flow, capillary density, and the number of circulating leukocytes all are lower in elderly persons than in young people. Arterial rigidity, however, can be considered a negative cardiovascular sign. In blood vessels, the endothelium, the thinnest layer of the tunica intima, is the first to undergo the structural and functional changes of aging. It has been suggested that age-related endothelial dysfunction may lead to reduced capacity to maintain vascular tone or to the regression of the vascular wall, thereby causing peripheral arterial stiffening. In addition, end-organ ischemia and myocardial ischemic disorders are more frequent in the elderly. Some of the above changes can be considered as age-dependent manifestations of a reduced reserve capacity of the heart and the vascular system, and they may be responsible, at least in part, for the increased risk of myocardial infarction, sudden death, and ischemic heart disease in the elderly.Q:
