Improved detection of X-linked mental retardation using whole-exome sequencing: use of a novel loss-of-function filter. The number of individuals with undiagnosed genetically unexplained mental retardation (MR) and intellectual disability (ID) has increased considerably in recent years. Current methods for identification of rare genetic causes of these disorders are not sufficient and are hampered by low coverage and high false-positive rates. Whole-exome sequencing (WES) is an emerging genomic analysis method that has been used with great success in recent years. We performed WES on 29 MR and 20 ID patients (at least 5 year period of follow-up) who were referred with an initial diagnosis of MR/ID. On average 3.17% (range 0-14.3%) of exons were lost, resulting in a reduction of 2.3-fold after filtering. Because of the small size of the gene catalogue, there was an increase in the number of de novo genomic rearrangements identified in ten individuals. These numbers of variants were statistically higher than expected. While traditional methods may not be able to detect these events, our loss-of-function filter can identify many of these potentially harmful mutations. In 12 cases, loss-of-function variants were identified in a gene for which no sequence variation or linkage was reported in Online Mendelian Inheritance in Man (OMIM) or in the population groups with the most appropriate in-house database. In four of these cases, no sequence variation was found by Sanger sequencing of candidate genes in the proband. In conclusion, we show that WES, together with our novel loss-of-function filter, provides a comprehensive and reliable diagnostic service.
