What's New In Photoshop Free Replacement Download?

A Toronto woman who said she was sexually assaulted in downtown Toronto in March has filed a $25-million lawsuit against the city. Kerri Tolley, 28, has sued the city for "inadequate police investigation" and failing to adequately secure the crime scene for her safety, her lawyer said Thursday. Tolley says she was grabbed from behind and assaulted in the early hours of March 24 on the fenced-in grounds of the Canadian National Exhibition. She ran into the arms of a police officer but no suspect was arrested. According to her statement of claim, police on the scene arrested her and took photos of her, who she was told was injured. Police later treated her as a potential victim, instead of a suspect, she claims. Crown attorney Jeff Wilson, speaking to reporters Thursday on behalf of the city, said the claim is without merit and that charges were laid in response to a police complaint after a thorough investigation. "Kerri Tolley filed this claim without any reasonable basis whatsoever." Police say arrest warrants were issued, but charges were not laid due to 'insufficient evidence.' (The Canadian Press) "It's a standard procedure in the city of Toronto to lay those charges. We issued the search warrant to collect the clothing at the location," said Wilson. The officer who arrested Tolley is not named in the claim, but Wilson said Thursday that he's named for "personal reasons." Wilson said he was not aware of the woman's claim that she was assaulted or that she was later taken to the hospital. Tolley's lawyer, Brock Lesnar, said that's because the claim has not yet been filed in a court. "She didn't want to talk to the media to get publicity, but she did speak with the police," said Lesnar. Tolley described the assault on a Facebook post that went viral last month. It sparked a series of investigations into the crime and who committed it. Meanwhile, the city launched a public awareness campaign highlighting the area's "deterrence" as one of the only parks open to the public during the CNE. It also launched a major police investigation into the assault and the number of reported sexual assaults in the area spiked.
