For example: if you search for the latest title from Warner, you will get a list of all the new DVDs that are currently available and a list of the lowest priced of those titles. You can also search for: Academy, R, Chris, New, Arl, Theatrical, Vintage and so on. After you type the title, simply click on the bottom right of the window and the prices will load on the right side of the screen. You can then choose a title and compare it to another title by clicking on the side buttons. You can change the size of the box, the font, and the colors (white, gray, black) just as any standard Excel spreadsheet would. All you have to do is set the format and get in the mood to sit and play. The Prices are presented in three formats: 1) Price Per Day: This is the average price per day for that title divided by the day count for that title as of the last update. Price Per Week: This is the average price per week for that title divided by the week count for that title as of the last update bill The Australian Royal Bird, also known as the Australian Paintbrush, is an extinct native bird of the Australo-Australian region. Its scientific name is Eopsaltria australis, and in its time it was known by many names, including "painted button-quail," "drooping button-quail" and most commonly, as "Australian canary." This species of quail was restricted to single tiny populations and was near extinction in 1940 when it survived in a few scattered locations, including one in the Gerringong district on the south coast of New South Wales. Description The Australian Royal Bird has a compact body with comparatively long tail and a distinct central crest. The adult male bird reaches about in length, with the female measuring and the young reaching only about in length. Like most birds from Australia, it had a small head and short neck, and was spindle-shaped in shape, with a cylindrical, lithe, or upright posture and it was easily confused with the Crested Pigeon, a very similar species with an upright body like the Australian Royal Bird. In a 1991 survey done by the Australian Museum, the Australian Royal Bird was found to be very close in appearance to the Crested Pigeon. The most striking feature about the Australian Royal Bird was its bright orange or red coloured breast, its relatively long tail feathers and the conspicuous crest on the top of its head. The tail-feathers were longer than the legs of the bird and were very similar in appearance to those of the Crested Pigeon. The other characteristics which enabled this bird to be identified were its grunting call and call-note, its "drooping tail", and its diet of sap-sucking insects. Taxonomy and evolution The evolutionary history of this bird is not well understood, although it probably diverged fairly recently from other canary-like songbirds. It has been discovered that the earliest fossil of the Australian Royal Bird is from the mid-precambrian which, along with its sedimentary age and the fact that the other members of this bird group are all strictly restricted to Australia, has led some scientists to speculate that it pre-dated the emergence of the other Australasian birds. This has led to a number of hypotheses, including that it may be the "missing link" between the Australian rats, cockatoos and lorikeets

Vogue and Tail'Boys are getting together to start up a new branch of the business. They are bringing in various items that can serve to expand their services. One of them is the new bait fish. Since Vogue and Tail'Boys are really into fishing now, they want to see if these new fish have any similarities with their previous fishes. In addition, they want to test out the fish in the waters of Cami-Net. This is NOT a First Person Shooter. As such, the camera is fixed in one place with no option to change it. That said, you DO get to see your opponent. Depending on the match, you can make use of this to your advantage. That's not to say you can't move. You can move. The goal is to use your moves to the best of your advantage. So in the event that you are slow to respond, your enemy could have gotten over there first. Be responsive to your opponent's moves, use your environment to your advantage. If he gets in close, you'll want to counter-attack. Similar to the previous game, on this one you're playing in the role of a monster, equipped with a special skill. Players will be able to use move-like actions. Each character has their own unique skill that appears on the bottom screen when you are playing, which determines if that character is vulnerable to a particular type of move. For example, the Sonic skill is vulnerable to certain types of normal attacks, while most of the boss skills will be susceptible to certain special moves. Since the game is a 3rd Person Shooter, you are not going to be able to perform any types of quick forward or backwards movements. Bait Fish is a 2D Fighting Game. In some matches, players will be controlling a pair of characters. The matches will get progressively harder as the rounds progress. The rounds are played out of a timer and players get progressively faster moves. As time runs out, players have to go into a battle mode where they have the power to perform combo attacks. In addition, there are a host of special moves that can be accessed via simple button presses. The controls are very responsive, with changes in movement speed being instantly reflected on screen. As in the previous game, the power of these moves is determined by your character. When you are up against a character with more life bars, you'll want to use your special moves for extra damage. In the event of a power up,
