That's the kind of parenting we try to encourage, rather than putting a price on it," says Jo Smith of the Australian Institute of Family Studies. This week the Victorian Institute of Sport runs a national parenting program which is designed to give parents the tools they need to help their children succeed in sport, and to keep them safe, as well. The program, funded by the Victorian State Government, will be delivered in schools throughout the state by specialist sport and physical education teachers. "The way we approach it is through a lot of shared problem-solving, but in a safe environment where they can talk about all aspects of their sport and physical education," says Ms Smith. There are two courses being offered, an introductory course for all parents and a more in-depth course for those who are more experienced in sport, and the program is led by "experienced, independent sport and physical education teachers who have a background in working with children," she says. "It's more about getting them to focus on the things that really matter when they are playing sport and physical education." The first course runs over two weeks, with the second course beginning in mid-April. The first course is recommended for those parents who are new to sport, or those who are concerned about their child's safety, especially if that child is a beginner, and for all parents who want to learn more about how to keep their child safe while participating in sport. The second course is more for experienced parents who want to get up to date on the latest advances in child health, safety and physical education. "The courses have been designed so that they are simple, so that the parents can understand it, and are practical in the sense that it's something they can do," says Ms Smith. "As well as being confident
