In a previous blog post, I discussed the importance of maintaining your credit score, and how you can accomplish this by building credit. I made a recommendation of the wonderful TrueCredit, which is a free tool for viewing and monitoring your credit. TrueCredit combines some of the best features of the major credit reporting agencies and allows you to verify and monitor your credit information all in one place. I highly recommend it. In addition to maintaining a good credit score, one of the other very important features of your personal financial picture is to increase your net worth. To do this, we first must know how much money you have and then how much of it you are using. Our family is in the process of doing exactly that, as part of the Make Money Not Debt series, and it has been an interesting journey. It is quite true that many people are paycheck to paycheck, and to become debt free, we need to take control of our finances and the way we spend money. Most of us know that we have less than we think, and that it is a lot more difficult to gain new debt than it is to lose existing debt. We have to separate our money, and then spend carefully. The calculator is a free tool that I created for my recent post on the Psychology of Money. It is designed to help you understand how much money you have and how much of it you owe, as well as how much you could save each month. The concept behind it was inspired by a conversation I had with a friend about how she felt about her money situation and how we could see her changing that situation for the better. If you have low scores, and you are concerned about how to get them to where they should be, I recommend speaking with a good credit counselor. I would rather help you improve than hurt you, and it is very much worth the time spent. If you have high scores, you know what is important to you. You want the best outcome and you are a talented musician, so if you have a good attitude
