Sensory modulation of visual perception in T cell activity. This article reviews the evidence that T cells are actively involved in the modulation of sensory perception. We argue that the modulation, or at least the modulation of specific information in a sensory stimulus, is the result of T cell actions on sensory neurons. Our primary focus is on investigating the molecular and cellular basis of one of the most important examples of modulation; namely, the blocking of visual and thermal information during the acquisition of an immune response. As a more general theme, we explore the possibility of T cell modulation of vision as an evolutionary adaptation.
