Ejaculatory disorder is a frequent condition diagnosed during urologic practice. Recently, its association with psychological disturbances has been suggested by a number of authors. But few data are available. We reported a case of ejaculatory disorder associated with depression in a patient aged 35 years, complaining of ejaculation difficulty and/or anorgasmia, without impact on his sexuality. The diagnosis was based on the clinical examination, the clinical interview and the total andrological assessment, including psychologic and psychosocial questionnaires, the ad hoc enquiry concerning ejaculation difficulties, and biochemical tests. The clinical picture was characterized by a generalized hypomotility, ejaculation difficulties with intra-individual variability, nocturnal erections and no desire or arousal. The anorgasmia was diagnosed by the exclusive presence of ejaculatory disorder. The diagnosis of depression was based on the clinical interview and the MMPI and Wender Utah, the latter being the gold standard of the clinical diagnosis of depression. The estrogen/androgen ratio was elevated in the blood, the serum testosterone was normal and the seminal vesicle function was found normal. Treatments were carried out successfully and the patient became symptom-free. It seems that ejaculatory disorder associated with depression is a real nosological entity. Orgasmic difficulties should not be considered as the only determinant of the couples' sexual life and psychotherapy should be considered. The association is not due to the dysfunction of either of the organs. XPS-based determination of the bonding nature of carbonyl and acetyl groups in peptide and protein derivatives: 6d1f23a050
