tekla structures also supports the concept of loosely coupled design. this means an engineer can modify the model in any other application without affecting the tekla structures model. for example, the drawing and schedules can be kept in the cad package, and then the model can be brought back into tekla structures for formal approval. tekla structures includes an array of built in analysis features, including: automatic removal of structural elements, automatic detection of joints, automatic detection of non-continuous elements, automatic detection of beam elements, automatic detection of columns, automatic detection of slab elements, automatic detection of components, and automatic detection of any unconnected elements. the system also includes a series of pre-defined analysis tools, which can be applied to components as and when required. for users requiring an easy to use, web based client, tekla structures also comes with an html based application. the application runs on a web server, so it can be accessed on any computer, including mobile devices. the html version has all the functionality of the windows based client, but does not require the users to install the software. tekla structures also includes a command line version of the software, which can be used by people who need to automate or remotely access the software on a unix/linux system. this can be used to generate reports, update the model or perform other functions. the command line application is ideal for users on windows machines who want to access the application using the windows command prompt.
