debbie edrington, newly retired editor of gardens illustrated, has long been a supporter of all the efforts going on to raise the profile and profile of the media in gardening. she has a list of worthwhile publications she has reviewed over the years on her website at debiedrington.com. you can also follow her on twitter at @debiedrington. as a new bike commuter, i was amazed to see how many professional travelers the zg team put on this route. it's great to see the zg team doing so much for so many bike commuters. in a previous note, i mentioned "a public route" that i had been enjoying for seven years. this year, for the first time, it received public monies. this represents only a tiny fraction of the daily riders. it's great to be associated with a project as cool and important as the national garden bureau. they just finished a new headquarters, built with $22 million in federal funds. with any luck, the national garden bureau will stay around for a good while. their projects are important. i had the privilege of meeting them at the urban farm institute last summer, and it was a very rewarding experience. i hope the urban farm institute keeps doing the remarkable work they are doing, too. i don't have kids, but my husband and i are very happy so far with my daughter. i am a huge fan of primers such as "the baby book: everything you need to know to raise a healthy baby and a happy toddler" and "raising baby and toddler". there's a lot of great info in those books. my daughter has been 1 years old, i feel good about the time we spent watching the world cup together. hopefully, she will appreciate that event as i do, which is more than could be said for her dad. my daughter is beautiful and funny. i love how she makes me smile. she makes her family smile. my daughter is smart and will grow up to be wonderful person.

as an educational writer, if you are not on the editorial side, you're a gatekeeper. it's your job to make sure that the education content you put out is clear, accurate, and timely. you are the one who is supposed to take time to edit the teacher letters who get their stories ready for publication, and steer them clear of any grammatical mistakes and factual inaccuracies. you are the one who must determine if the event you write about is educationally valuable and insightful. and you are the one who must wade through the interest group letters, telling your school district how we should allocate resources or how we should organize our cafeterias. sometimes, you find it hard to distinguish between the two because people in those groups are often looking for more than education content; they are looking for that same access to news media that you may seek as a writer of editorial content. and you should think of those groups as your competition, because they want to appear on the news you are selling. at the same time, as a publisher, you know that if you are not offering quality content for your readers, who are other advertisers who seek eyeballs, they will go elsewhere. but at some point, you are going to have to get over it. if you don't, you don't have a business any more. if you love writing, and if you love being an editor, then let me ask you this: why are you not running your own magazine? why are you not running a book publishing company? because you are an employee, subject to the interests of your publisher. it's time to treat yourself like any other business owner in the united states, with the power to determine who you will represent. if you want to get paid for the stories you want to write and the angles you want to pursue, it will take more than a paycheck from an editor. you will have to turn down the jobs that don't serve your interests, or find clients with their own agendas and your own editorial standards. it should be a competitive, adversarial relationship that pushes you to be the best.
