and just in case you were doubting our convictions, please be informed that casino royale may be great, but it is not, as the son of hound would proclaim, the best bond film. still, skyfall isn't just a better film, its also the best film. ah skyfall, the film that established christian bale as a capable successor to the legendary pierce brosnan. bale brings a new intensity to the role, though, turning the former tv anchor into an operative who is frustrated by the injustices of the world. the film is full of pathos and brings the franchise in a new direction. we like this one. this is it, this is your worst nightmare, you thought spectre was big, you thought spectre was bad, but 'skyfall' is the most extreme and disturbing version of what is already the worst version of spectre ever. skyfall is the most disturbing spectre film ever! we previously recommended casino royale as the best bond film ever . we stand by that now, but only because skyfall is also a good film, and we want to be completely fair. daniel craig, meanwhile, is back for another go-round as the time? perhaps bond may never be the same after craig? still, even with that cataclysmic end, mendes and company manage to surpass themselves. mendes' direction is restrained, and while not a technical challenge, it does show from time to time. 'skyfall' is at its most exciting when we are closer to bond's point of view, and mendes structures sequences so that we observe everything from the point of view of the character or subject, and that helps balance the elements of excitement and scale which deakins sets forth in the present day sequences. also of note is the use of nature in 'skyfall' as a world-builder. mendes treats the scottish highlands as a character in its own right, and again we see themes of nature, and emphasis of the group rather than the individual. as far as these themes, i would argue that casino royale brought the british character to the fore, but its grip on the bond character had loosened by the time mendes took over. 'skyfall' does an excellent job of strengthening the bond between bond and m, but the bond/q relationship is important as well, which it supplies on an emotional level.

deckard on his very last mission. it's inescapable. the angel on his shoulder has to come for him. it's going to happen. bond is going to die. in the 24th 007 film, there is no hero. there is only he. and it's a death that comes sooner than we've seen in any of the films before. but if you go back to the first title, dr. no, there was no such darkness. it was a simple story, told with plenty of heart. bond's greatest enemy is himself. he's a control freak, a sadist, and a megalomaniac. there is nothing redeemable about bond, and he's nothing more than a mouthpiece for the villains. the difference in how the series is approaching its conclusion is that while the last two films toyed with bond being redeemed, they never really gave him a chance to be redeemed. in 'skyfall', we meet bond at his most bitter, and yet it still comes as no surprise when he destroys his greatest enemy. ironically, a studio that is synonymous with great martial arts films has failed to produce an unequivocal martial arts film. there was the sort of crappiness that even bruce lee had to put up with in the game of death ("you learned well. the fist? you learned nothing."), but even those movies had action sequences that were exciting and kinetic. this version of "skyfall" is only as good as the villain, but the fight sequences are poor to say the least. the choreography is flat and usually empty. even the big one where bond endangers a bunch of goons and a helicopter, with the stunt crew just standing there while a bus of them falls out of the sky, lacks the impact or fury that it could have had. bond's fight choreography with silva is the highlight of the sequence, but even he is technically unsteady at times. bardem's fight with bond is even less memorable, involving a hardcore scene where he smashes through glass with his head, and tossing sheets of metal around in an effort to murder a train. 5ec8ef588b
