For many years, fishing rods and reels have been provided with electrical components such as fishing lights and fish finding and detection devices, and such devices have been controlled from a boat through an electrical connection. In the past, electrical connections between the electrical components of the fishing rod and the boat have been established through a sealed electrical transformer, and the electrical circuit was controlled through a hand switch on the boat. This type of switching was generally satisfactory when the person operating the hand switch was ready to cast the line or retrieve the fish at the same time. However, a person fishing at night on a lake or river could not readily detect when the fish had been caught and it was necessary to spend the time flipping the switch to check and see if the fish had been caught before continuing fishing. The present invention is directed to overcome one or more of the problems as set forth above. 04aeff104c
