While AMC's new "Santa Clarita Diet" is a silly, sometimes gross show, it has been well received by critics. My early review, published on the website Bleeding Cool, said that the show, following a young couple who discover that they have a disease which can only be fought by eating and consuming a wide variety of food and drink, was “slightly more than just a wee bit stupid”. The conclusion of the review, however, was less than favourable as it mentioned that I had “waited for all 8 episodes and despite enjoying some of what I saw, I wanted to wait for the whole thing to play out before writing my review.” I did not intend for the review to be rather partial and lacking in substance but this episode of the new series seemed to have been designed to inspire very strong reactions from its viewers. As viewers of the show would surely be aware, and as I reported in my review, there is a five-part series arc that covers one entire season of the show. In the show’s first episode, the character of Madison (Drew Barrymore) is diagnosed with a rare condition called multiple endocrine neoplasia type 1 (MEN1). This condition causes over-activity of the pituitary gland, thyroid gland
