In today's world, the way we find and share inspiration has never been easier or swifter. But while inspiration is all over the internet, it's often in giant, overwhelming streams of images, which is intimidating to begin with, and often too overwhelming to sort through and find what you're looking for. One of the biggest aspects of today's digital design process, however, is the way people design and collaborate. While a new generation of designers may still be inspired by classical design techniques and existing processes, many are turning to a new set of design tools and online sharing platforms—including YouTube, Instagram, Pinterest, and, yes, Adobe's Photoshop . The speed with which these platforms can enhance and share our work means that inspired ideas are no longer a pipe dream for only a handful of inspired artists. They can be quickly shared with hundreds or thousands of other people and can even span the globe in an instant. Thus we're introducing Photoshop's New Stream for inspiration: "Inspiration Stream," a new way to share and find digital inspiration, through both active and passive sharing. The goal of this update is to help inspire the next generation of designers, artists, and creators.
