Sante DICOM Viewer Professional.What is the difference between attacking and defeating? It doesn't matter what the combat rules say. I'm referring to the philosophical divide between Realist vs. Idealist. The realist side ("idealist" as applied to combat) says that the only way to have a successful battle is for two opponents to bring their forces to bear on each other. This is true as long as the ideals of combat (Nations, States, Individuals) are at stake. The idealist side says that it's possible to win against an enemy without having to engage them. This is correct if you are fighting for ideas, and have no requirement to eliminate anything but yourself. Of course, both sides will dispute the merits of each other's point of view. (Personally I don't care if you win or lose in the universal confrontation. I care about the ideals I wish to defend or strive for, with which I must confront threats. I also care if you're dead, which is a different matter.) I'm curious about the differences. Any insight appreciated. — I'm not often philosophically correct; my posts are meant to provoke thought, not prove my point. "Arguing in a circle is a lazy man's way of learning. The best way to learn anything is to study what others have said and try to determine where they went wrong." -- John Grossman Not to be a pedant, but I assume you mean philosophical and not accomodationist. I would have thought that an idealist would see the need for battle, and not want to spend energy to find a way not to have to engage. Idealists seem to view war as a regrettable but inevitable means of
