It adds a bunch of features and enhancements that will be more compelling to some folks than others. The feature I really want is a full-featured version of Visual Style. But I don't need it because of a crucial idea: that being in Adobe Photoshop CS5 is better than being in Photoshop CC, and a straight upgrade to CC is better than CS5 ever was. Note that I said "straight upgrade" because, well, that's what Adobe does. It's great for new users to upgrade for just $2 a month, as it costs a lot less than a full-blown upgrade. But Photoshop CC is _stacking_ a lot of value on top of that buyer's belief that Photoshop is an absolute must for any design, even ones that are merely for a collection, which you can do with Elements. What's more, readers who are upgrading from Photoshop CS5 to Photoshop CC will get a lot. You get a whole lot of new features. And the Photoshop CC license allows you to run the program on multiple machines in addition to your Mac, PC, and iOS devices. Future-proofing is great. The new software, dubbed Photoshop for iPad, is available as a lite and pro version, both of which require the full artwork packs, one for the lite version and three for the pro version. For the most part, the software is very familiar and intuitive. But the new Creative Panels feature feels just a little anachronistic next to the rest of the work, which is the reason I'm not terribly impressed. I'd rather Photoshop had a tool bar or dock where you could access, for example, rather than having to open another panel up by clicking on a menu.

The new feature allows teams to rapidly collaborate even when others don't have Adobe Creative Cloud accounts and access to the app itself so they can use their shared notebooks and deliver to a common stream of creative work. Based on the proven Adobe Keynote sharing tool, Share for Review allows five people, or an unlimited number with Adobe Creative Cloud members, to share a dynamic presentation -- such as a video, 3D model or interactive infographic -- and send it to one or more other viewers. These viewers can then mark up the presentation, make edits and annotate in real time, while others in the group are able to also make changes to the presentation without affecting the original. And with a simple Mac or Windows-based pull request, the team has complete control over the shared presentation for the duration of the group collaboration, allowing the team to make announcements, get feedback on changes, publish and live-stream the final product, and manage permissions for different team members.
